chert found in the local churchyard, has gone astray in the post.

I would be most grateful if you could write to me at the above address, or even perhaps forward the flake for my inspection, so that I can let you know my opinion on its date and function. I will be away on leave from 15th to 29th August, but will attend to the matter promptly on my return.

Yours faithfully
James Barber

I later wrote

Dear Sir

My apologies for not writing in reply to your letter of 13th August about the flint found in Suffitt Churchyard before now. At the time of receipt I felt that there was no need for haste and would therefore wait until after your leave, and so with harvest and other problems the delay has been longer than I intended.

This was found by a monumental mason quite near the surface having dug through quite a heap of this material at the edge of a steep bank when making room for a kerbstone. Their thought at the time was that they had encountered a drain, and only when depositing the surplus material behind a bush and levelling over did he spot this, which he recognised as a worked flint, having seen other similar flints in a dig some years ago at Hembury Fort. My wonder is, as a warden here and quite interested in the past history of our Church and parish, would the site reveal anything further if investigated?

As it is in a bank too steep to have been used for burials this would not be difficult, but useless for me to do anything being completely ignorant of the subject.
Your opinion on, and advice, would be appreciated.

Yours sincerely
John Sage

Dear Sir

Many thanks for your letter of 8th September, and for sending with it the flake for my inspection. I am very sorry to be so long in acknowledging its safe arrival.

The flake is not in fact made of flint, but of a similar material known as chert. This particular type of chert is known to originate in and near Broom, in the Axe Valley on the border of Devon and Dorset: many ancient implements have been found there in the course of working pits for ballast. I rather suspect that your flake may have been brought to Luffitt in fairly recent times with a load of material from the ballast pits, and that excavation near where it was found, is accordingly unlikely to yield evidence for the early history of Luffitt itself.

The flake is of a type made in the Old Stone Age, and used as a general purpose knife and scraper. Its upper surface shows the scars left by the removal of other flakes from the original core, in the course of trimming it to the required shape. The flake itself was removed from the core by a single well-aimed blow, and required no extra trimming round its edges to make it a worthwhile tool.

1994 Flake sent to conference at R.A. museum Later returned with note on cover of tin. 'FLAKE, PAL. & MESOLITHIC OR EVEN LATER 2000 BC PLUS.

It is not possible to estimate a date for the flake's manufacture with any accuracy: it belongs to a late phase in the Old Stone Age, just before the last onset of glaciation during the Ice Age, and was probably made over 30,000 years ago.

I am returning the flake herewith.

Yours sincerely
James Barber.

Stone

The Luppitt Stone

This stone used to be lying flat by the roadside on the pathway above the churchyard leading to it.

1951 Mr Harry Rowland (Died 1951) thought that the Tenor bell was unloaded on to it when brought from the foundry.

It could well have been about wagon height.

Rev H.T. Ellacombe dates this bell about c1550

It was dislodged during snow clearance operations after the blizzard of February

1978 1978 (see snapshot in Church Album) and placed on the opposite high hedgebank with tractor front shower bucket.

Mr Ralph Wright brought it back to the 1982 pathway on 24th April 1982.

It was erected on a concrete base near the car park entrance and fastened to a pipe embedded in the concrete by 1983 A Clatt, A Wright & J Sage on 18th March 1983.
